Spousal Abuse

• It is estimated that 29% of Canadian women have, at some point, suffered abuse from their partners.

• In some cases it’s the man that’s abused but in most cases it is the woman being abused.

• Men who abuse their partners generally come from a background with a family history of violence or abuse.
Family Problems
Spousal Abuse

- They believe they have the right to dominate their spouses

- Sometimes supported also by the people around them

- When their domination is threatened, these men experience stress and they react to re-establish control
Family Problems
Spousal Abuse

• Feminist theorists maintain that dominant social attitudes support male power

• Ex.....boys more than girls are taught to be tough and hit........

• Why do many abused women refuse to leave their abusive spouses?
Family Problems

Spousal Abuse

- A psychological pattern described as battered woman syndrome.

- Abused spouses become anxious and fearful. They develop emotional disorders and a pattern of learned helplessness.

- This condition is used as a defence in court for women who commit extreme acts because they view these acts as their only option.
Family Problems

Spousal Abuse

- Women are also sometimes unable to leave their spouses because economically they cannot support themselves and their children.

- Also fear the reaction of their spouse at their decision to leave.

Family Problems

Divorce

• Although marriage is traditionally seen as a lifelong commitment, a growing number of marriages end up in divorce

• In the 1960’s it was difficult to get a divorce, since adultery and desertion were the primary grounds
Family Problems

Divorce

• The 1968 divorce act widened the grounds for divorce to include physical or mental cruelty, imprisonment, alcohol or drug addiction and separation for three years.

• These changes resulted in an immediate growth in the divorce rate.
Family Problems

Impact of Divorce

• Strong emotional impact on everybody involved

• Younger children suffer more of a short-term impact

• In the long run, girls may be reluctant to form close relationships because they are in fear of being betrayed
